

MENTO MAKE GIANTS

A Substance That Doubles Physical Strength in Five Minutes.

INCREASING THE STATURE

Interesting Development of the Brown-Séquard Elixir of Life—Some Experiments.

"I hear a good deal at this time of year about medicines to build up a man's system and give him 'brawn' and other disagreeable feelings by the use of only half a dozen bottles, but how about a medicine that will increase a man's physical vigor and muscular strength threefold in five minutes? That looks modern. It seems to be adapted to this busy age."

The dose is only five drops; it is at the disposal of the whole medical profession, any doctor can make it, the materials are cheap and the product ought not to cost much. Sullivan should get his championship back by means of it, and as it works upon the brain as well as upon the muscles, we should have a stationer and a literature by next week at the furthest.

There may be an exaggeration, but it is no joke. The substance really exists, and the writer had the privilege of seeing an experimental use of it a few days ago. Let me first say a few words about the history of its development. Every body remembers the wild boasts of enthusiasm with which Dr. Brown-Séquard's "Elixir of Life" was received some years ago. It was the secret hope of many an old man, the open delight of the young, an inspiration to the quacks, and, after all, an object of some interest to the true man of science. For it really wasn't so absurd as it was painted. The truth about it was never printed in the newspapers, and, indeed, couldn't be printed. It was founded on a principle as old as the hills and an article of faith to a set of those who ridiculed the elixir.

But what has become of it? Had it drifted into total obscurity? Probably most of the readers of this article will be surprised to learn that it formed the subject of an address before a meeting of learned and conservative physicians in New York a few weeks ago, and that practical results of the development of the idea were set forth by a high medical authority. Since the war and fear of time have taken away the right of imposture from this substance—or

TESTING THE ELIXIR.

Reverend—and since it is not a proprietary remedy the mention of which will be an advertisement for an alibi but probably unlearned manufacturers, an account of its scientific development may properly be given.

It will be remembered that the name of Dr. William A. Hammond, retired surgeon general of the army, was associated with that of Dr. Brown-Séquard when the elixir was in the heyday of its popularity with the paragon of more benefit to the state than it was to Dr. Hammond, but his reputation stood the strain very well. The present writer had occasion to call upon Dr. Hammond at his residence in this city a few days ago and there incidentally learned of the present status of Dr. Brown-Séquard's idea in the scientific world. Dr. Hammond was hospitably displaying to his visitor the contents of his magnificent residence when the latter approached and said: "If you please, sir, how can I obtain some of the elixir and the book which she can't handle alone?"

Without hesitating to be anxious about the railway arrangements of that hour, I supposed, in a general way, that Dr. Hammond was to figure in his life of fare pretty soon.

"There's seventy-nine of 'em, sir," said the butler, "and the book says you'll know how to get 'em ready."

Mr. Hammond sometimes entertains quite regularly, but I could not suppose that he designed to give a banquet for which seventy-nine of his brains could be required. Perhaps he was going to pick them.

"Yes," said the doctor, "let Emma help him. I want them all to be ready by tomorrow."

So the whole lot was to be consumed at a sitting? Perhaps I showed my astonishment for Dr. Hammond came to my relief.

"I shall use the elixir to make what I call 'cervine,'" said he. "It is a special development of the Brown-Séquard elixir, which you doubtless remember."

I admitted the recognition, and then asked what "cervine" was. For some time the doctor held the way to his laboratory. We passed the great square central hall of the full height of the building and lighted from above—and, entering by a door beyond the long library, were immediately in the presence of filters, bottles and the smell of antiseptics.

"You remember," said the doctor, "that I made some experiments with the Brown-Séquard elixir. I found a good deal in it, but these were fatal injections. Of course, you did not believe the nonsense which was written about that substance. It was not designed to transform by some magical process an old gray-beard into a blooming youth. It was an effort to restore to certain organs of the body a healthy vigor by treating the patient with the expressed juice of the corresponding organs of a Guinea pig. And it did in certain cases, when injected into the blood, prove capable of restoring to some extent the faculties of old age. I became convinced that we had in this substance a means of acting upon the body in a manner and to an extent different from those obtainable by any other agent known to medical science."

"But nothing came of it," said I. "There were certain practical difficulties in the way of bringing the substance into general use in actual practice," he replied. "In the first place it had to be used fresh, for, if not, there was great danger of a putrefaction process being set up, and blood poisoning produced. Then there were technical difficulties in the way of filtering, etc., not necessary to mention here. After a time, therefore, I gave up the preparation of the juice by the Brown-Séquard method, and turned my attention to preparing extracts from other portions of animal bodies and in a different way. Each of these extracts is applied to the cure of diseases in the corresponding organs of the human body. Cervine is one of them."

"I see," said I. "It is the old idea: 'Every part strength is a part.' That is a section of the dietary system of the East. If a man is lean he eats fat. If he has bunions he eats pigs' feet."

"That is the scientific method of applying the idea, perhaps," said he, "and it is old, of course. I recollect reading nearly forty years ago an account of some observations made by a German physician—I think he was a German—relative to the treatment of diseases of the several organs of the body by a system of diet, consisting of the corresponding organs of healthy animals. Thus, liver disease was treated by liver, heart disease by heart, etc. I cannot trace the article I read, but it certainly exists, or did exist."

"Now to return to cervine. The method of preparation is simple. The whole brain of the ox, after being thoroughly washed in water acidulated with boric acid, is cut into small pieces in a mincing machine. To one thousand grammes of this substance placed in a wide mouthed, glass-stoppered bottle, I add three thousand cubic centimeters of a mixture consisting of one thousand cubic centimeters each of a saturated solution of boric acid in distilled water, of pure glycerine and of absolute alcohol. This is allowed to stand in a cool place for at least six months, being well shaken or stirred two or three times a day. At the end of this time it is thrown upon a porous stone filter, through which it percolates very slowly, requiring about two weeks for entirely passing through. The residue on the filter is then inclosed in several layers of aseptic gauze and subjected to a pressure of over a thousand pounds, the exudate being allowed to fall upon a filter and mixed with sufficient water of filtrate to cover it. When it has entirely filtered it is thoroughly mixed with the first filtrate and the process is complete."

I give these directions at length because they are so simple that they put the substance at once into the power of any physician to procure. This is not a "private discovery," it is given to the profession in accordance with the strictest rules of the excellent code of medical ethics. Physicians well know that during the entire progress of the operation described above the most rigid antiseptic precautions must be taken. The vessels and instruments required are kept in boiling water for several minutes and are then washed in a solution of boric acid. Microscopic examinations are also to be made, as an ultimate precaution against the development of bacteria.

And now for the popular side of the matter. What will this substance do? Five drops, with an equal quantity of distilled water, injected under the skin in the ordinary way is the dose. In five or ten minutes the pulse begins to beat much stronger and fuller, and increases ten to twenty beats a minute. The face becomes slightly flushed and there is a feeling of detestation in the head, sometimes accompanied by headache. There is nothing very remarkable about that, but here is something worth mentioning. In many cases elderly persons treated in this way find a remarkable change in their power of vision. The condition known as presbyopia—or falling of sight from old age—disappears. The person sees almost as well as he ever did. This experiment has been tried under many conditions and there is no doubt that surprising results are produced.

Still more remarkable is the effect upon the muscular strength. In the experiment which the writer had the pleasure of witnessing a large and strong man was asked to put up a dumb bell weighing forty-five pounds. He did it fourteen times with his right arm and eleven times with his left. It needed but a glance from one trained to athletic exercises—as the writer has had the advantage of being trained—to show that the man was doing his best, and that he reached substantially the limit of his ability in the present state of his muscular development. After an injection of this fluid he "put up" the dumb bell forty-two times with his right arm and thirty-five times with his left, and did it easier than before. He showed less exhaustion and worked in better form. His appearance was simply that of a man in better training—of increased general vigor—than in the previous instance. He had a slight headache afterwards.

I feel the deepest certainty that I have seen thousands of dollars change hands on the result of a contest in the "squared circle" when five drops of cervine would have changed the result. "If this thing becomes known," said I to Dr. Hammond, "you will have a line of prize fighters outside your door reaching from here to the capital."

"These effects are generally observed after one hypodermic injection," said the doctor, "and they continue for several periods, some of them lasting for several days."

He was referring to other bodily symptoms of interest principally to physicians which he had mentioned to me previously.

"In order that the effects shall be enduring," he continued, "two doses a day should be given every day or every alternate day, as may seem necessary, once in the morning and once in the afternoon. The most certain effects are now in the general improvement of the system"

An official who was out in the north-west long before there were any railroads in that part of the country says that the glaciers of the Selkirk range were pure white and blue then. Now they have a grayish, and in some places a reddish appearance, and on examining the surface of the ice it is found to be changed with little doubt of what seems to be dying. The official says that this is a result from the forest fire that devastation has carried into that region.

Glacial Changes.

an accompanying advancing year. I have employed cervine with curative effects in many diseases of the brain and nervous system. It is almost specific in those cases of nervous prostration—the so-called neurasthenia—due to reflex causes or excessive mental work or persistent and powerful emotional disturbances. A hypodermic injection of five drops twice daily for two or three weeks, and without other medicine, is sufficient for a cure. It is valuable in cases of cerebral congestion, in which the most prominent symptom is insomnia. "I have used it with advantage in treating epilepsy."

I was principally impressed by the power of the substance to—at least temporarily—increase physical strength. Whoever may be the origin of physicians as to the advantage of long treating with this substance in cases of illness, there can be no doubt about what might be done in the prize ring, the diamond or the football field. I believe that even Harvard with cervine could win against Yale.

Dr. Hammond proceeded to tell me that the extracts of which cervine is one must be taken hypodermically. It has recently been alleged by some medical authorities, he said, that the action of medicines was the same whether taken into the stomach or introduced under the skin. He rejects that theory, believing that the gastric juice produces changes which are essential.

"It is well known," said he, "that woorara, the virulent arrow poison used by the Indians of South America, which is invariably fatal to animal life when injected into the blood, is harmless if swallowed, even in large quantities. I have ascertained by actual experiment that the poison of the rattlesnake may be swallowed with impunity. During the course of my medical service on the plains I have collected a large quantity of rattlesnake poison. A small fraction of a grain injected hypodermically into a dog was sufficient to kill him in a few minutes, while previously the animal had been made to swallow half a drachm without apparent result."

On the same principle used in preparing "cervine," and by the same method "cardine" may be made from the hearts of oxen and other extracts from other parts.

"Now as to my theory," said Dr. Hammond, "Organic beings possess the power of assimilating from the nutritions matters they absorb the peculiar pabulum which each organ of the body demands for its development and sustenance. The brain, for instance, selects that part which it requires; the heart, the material necessary for its growth and preservation, and so on with the liver, the lungs, the muscles and the various other organs of the body. No mistake is ever committed; the brain never takes liver nutriment, nor the liver brain nutriment, but each selects that which it requires. There are, however, diseased conditions of the various organs in which this power is lost or impaired, and as a consequence disturbance of function, or even death itself, is the result."

"Now, if we can obtain the peculiar matter that an organ of the body requires and inject it directly into the blood, we do away with the performance of many vital processes which are accomplished only by the expenditure of a large amount of vital force. Let us suppose a person suffering from an exhausted brain, the result of excessive brain work. Three hours' meals are eaten every day, but no matter how judiciously the food may be arranged the condition continues. Now, if we inject into that person's blood a concentrated extract of the brain of a healthy animal we supply at once the pabulum which the organ requires. Then, if under this treatment the morbid symptoms disappear, we are justified in concluding that we have successfully aided nature in doing that which unaided she could not accomplish."

"All this is applicable not only to the brain, but certainly to the heart, the generative system, the spinal cord, and I believe, other organs of the body. I have repeatedly seen a feeble heart rendered strong, the blood corpuscles increased in number and the color of the blood deepened by the use of cervine, and I have many times seen a system, otherwise exhausted, restored to its normal power by the use of cervine and medulline."

It was interesting to me to see the Brown-Séquard rejuvenating elixir thus itself rejuvenated, together with that old maxim of my childhood, "Every part strengthens a part."

AMONG THE ESQUIMAUX.

Some of the Rites and Customs of This Northern Race.

Esquimaux are believers in ghosts. They also believe in the transmigration of the soul; that spirits return to animals, winds, rocks, ice and water; that they are evil, angry or good, as the elements are favorable or unfavorable; and that they can be appeased by hoodoo rites if the performer is sufficiently versed in occult sciences. To change the wind, for instance, records a contemporary, they chant, drum and howl against it, build fires, shoot against it, and, as a last resort, fire the graves of the dead. The tribes put hoodoo on each other by ceremonial dancing and howling. The hoodoo of total destruction upon neighbors is the building of a fire within sight of those coming under their displeasure. Tribal relations are severed by making a fire outside and burning all ornaments or disguises used in ceremonial dances, such as raven's skins, deer horns and masks. Tribes hoodooed retaliate; but with families and individuals it is different. Outlawed by their tribes or relatives they become discouraged and go off and die. Eccleptics of the moon almost paralyze the people with fear. Arctic earthquakes, having been coincident with eclipses of the moon, they say that an eclipse is a shadow of the earth being piled up and shaken. All the unfortunates in a village will howl and drum all night. Among the Nootka all hands rally around a pair of backbones, form a circle and march to the music of drums and chants till the eclipse is over.

ASTRONOMY AND ASTROLOGY.

The Science of Medicine and the Superstitions of Alchemy.

The astrologer of bygone ages taught the people that their diseases were due to some influence emanating from the stars or other heavenly bodies. The causes of the stars were supposed to govern the physical and historical destinies of mankind. Not only were they mistaken as to the cause of disease, but their ideas of cure were equally absurd. The poor, beguiled patient, whose disease was supposed to be under the malignant sway of some celestial body, was either turned over to the saving power of the grotesque mixtures of the alchemist, or given up at once to die. And yet these superstitions, as strange as they seem to this enlightened generation, like most other superstitions, had their origin in a partial truth.

There is a most intimate connection between the condition of health of the inhabitants of our planet and the astronomical cycle through which it passes every year. During the winter season the north pole of the earth has been tilted from the sun, which allows only the slanting rays of the sun to fall upon that portion of the earth's surface in which the United States are included. This affects the health of the people by exciting that class of disorders peculiar to spring. As spring approaches the north pole gradually becomes more and more tilted towards the sun, which brings the sun more directly overhead. The rays becoming more perpendicular, are highly charged with electrical power. This new relation between the earth and the sun produces another class of physical disorders peculiar to spring. The symptoms are quite unlike in different cases, but the most common ones are general lassitude, played-out, tired-out, used-up, run-down feelings, combined with more or less heavy stupor, and the entire pleasure in life is lost. The ability to digest food seems to be lost. Skin eruptions, sallow complexion, biliousness, coated tongue, fitful, irregular sleep, help to complete the picture which is so common at this season. Life is a burden, business a dreary pleasure, mockery, friends a bore, and social privileges a tedious round of disagreeable tasks.

Peruna so exactly meets all these conditions that the demand is so great for this remedy at this season of the year that it is nearly impossible to supply it. Car loads of Peruna are shipped north, south, east and west to meet the ever-increasing demand of the people for it. It never fails to bring an immediate relief, and a thorough course of it leads with certainty to a permanent cure.

Those desiring to become thoroughly posted on diseases of spring and the proper selection of a remedy should send at once to The Peruna Drug Manufacturing Company of Columbus, Ohio, for a free copy of "The Family Physician," a book entirely devoted to this subject.
